MANAGEMENT COMMENT

In October, emerging debt market indices performed negatively in local currency (-1.0%), while for debt issued in USD, indices stagnated (+0.1%) due to the relative performance of the US currency (J.P. Morgan GBI & EMBI indices).

Investor expectations of central bank policies continue to drive index movements. On the one hand, central bankers remain focused on inflation data that is still considered too high and, on the other hand, macroeconomic data published around the world show a slowdown in economic activity. Against this backdrop, financial market participants are watching for any sign of a possible easing in the monetary outlook (mainly from the US Federal Reserve) and are ready to invest in assets whose valuations have become particularly attractive in certain segments.

In general, the economies of emerging countries, and therefore the debt issued in these regions, continue to suffer from the international context and are impacted by central bank policies, the strength of the US dollar and the difficulties of the Chinese indices. The absolute performance of emerging market debt in general remains negative, but the last week of October was favorable for risky assets, including emerging market sovereign debt, with yields and credit spreads falling.
