MANAGEMENT COMMENT

The US 2-year sovereign rate continued to rise to +4.48%. The target rate for monetary policy is not yet defined. However, the weaker macro data has encouraged the markets to anticipate that the pivot point is near. The idea being that Central Banks will be more accommodative in their policies in front of an economic slowdown. In that way, credit premiums declined, i.e. a positive performance of the credit component of bonds. Nevertheless, the overall positioning of investments is defensive with very short maturities.
